OVERVIEW

Howard Tarkow has practiced law at Maslon LLP for over 40 years. His focus since 1986 has been almost exclusively on issues and concerns for employers in their relationships with their employees, and in their dealings with unions that represent their employees. Howard has obtained favorable results for many of Maslon's business and nonprofit clients in tough employment law lawsuits, administrative complaints, union grievance arbitrations, and collective bargaining. Howard also has assisted Maslon's clients in their efforts to maintain positive employee relations. Howard regularly provided creative interactive training programs for employers and their supervisors, and he has been a frequent speaker at continuing legal education conferences.

Representing clients in workplace law can test Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's famous teaching, "You can disagree without being disagreeable." The clients hire the lawyers to win emotional disputes over perceived fairness and unfairness, and about right and wrong. Complaints about discrimination, arguments over wages and hours, grievances, retaliation, tough positions in collective bargaining, and countless other contentious matters can feature feelings of anger, hurt, indignation, entitlement, and even outrage. The clients want to win, and they expect their advocates to do whatever it takes to get it done. Howard has derived great satisfaction from achieving considerable success for Maslon clients in many cases over the years and doing so without sacrificing civility.

Howard retired from the Maslon partnership at the end of 2017 and has continued to enjoy working part-time at the firm and with his excellent colleagues.
